THIS IS UNEVALUATED INFORMATION

1. The health of the population has been greatly improved since the Soviet occupation. Special attention has been given to hygiene and sports development. The incidence of scabies, which was widespread in the army, and syphilis has been decreased greatly. Tuberculosis is still a dangerous threat, in spite of some advancement in its prevention and treatment.
2. To improve the medical situation, the Government introduced the Soviet administrative system, increased medical supervision, improved the supply of medical equipment and medicines, and introduced new methods of treatment.
3. There were sufficient physicians and sanitary personnel. there were large pre-war stocks of proprietary medicines and enough basic medical supplies. On the civilian market there was a shortage of some medical supplies, especially aureomycin. Only limited quantities of streptomycin were available. There was no discrimination in the admission and treatment of patients.

The General Military Hospital in Sofia (Obshtovoiskova Bolnitsa Sofia).

4. The hospital had 1,000 beds. It had a director, a deputy director, a head for each department, and an assistant for each wing. Patients were admitted from various units as well as from unit hospitals and garrison commands.

5. The principal departments of the hospital were:
